lie was quite conscious that this would tell them nothing. It was true that the portrait still preserved, under all the foulness and ugliness of the face, its marked likeness to himself; but what cikild they learn from that? He would laugh at any one who tried to taunt him. He had not painted it. What was :: to him how vile and full of shame it looked ? Even if he toH them, would the\' believe it?

Vet he was afraid. Sometimes when he was down at his grirut house in Nottinghamshire, entertaining the fashionable younar men of his own rank who were his chief companions, and astounding the county by the wanton luxury and gorgeous splendour of his mode of life, he would suddenly leave his guests and rush back to town to see that the door had not been tampered with, and that the picture was still there.
